* Raster editing. An image in Photoshop is a raster. An image is stored as a rectangular grid of pixels. Some of the pixels hold information that describes the brightness of a colored patch. Others hold information that describes the tint of a gray area, and still others hold information that describes the shape of an area of pixels. Pixels in a single image may have the same information or they may have different information. Photoshop's editors and filters enable you to change the pixel information in the image. Growth arrest of the craniofacial bones is most often caused by significant head injury and is usually associated with other signs of intracranial damage. However, it is important to recognise that in some children with significant head injury associated with intracranial hypoxia, there is also impairment of growth. The use of CT scanning to identify non-dural causes of growth arrest is likely to be of practical help to both parents and health professionals. Even in the absence of direct skull fracture, there are increasing indications that intracranial haemorrhage associated with unilateral or bilateral widening of the diaphragm may impair growth in children with traumatic head injury.Q: Sharepoint Custom Form Field in List Views I have created a custom form field in Sharepoint. Tuesday, September 10, 2012 NASA's Solar Dynamics Observatory has obtained this still image of a huge solar flare. A new record for the size and energy of a solar storm is at hand. "What we're watching today is a very big explosion," said Jim Klimchuk, researcher and lecturer at University of Alabama in Huntsville (UAH), speaking at the University of New Hampshire in Durham, New Hampshire, September 9. "If it was a movie, we'd see the image almost doubling in size. "This solar flare is huge. It is more energetic than the Carrington Event, the storm that was detected by Loomis Swift in 1859 that had a storm of 30 million amperes in its current phase," he said. "I've been looking at solar storms like this for the last 15 years and they're getting bigger and bigger and we expect for 2012 to be one of the biggest of all time." Klimchuk, who is on sabbatical in Durham, says the wave of energy from the solar flare will pass Earth in two or three days, but could hit any time between September 11 and September 13. "We're looking at a structure that is about 2.5 light-years across and about 600,000 kilometers in width and height," he said. "We don't know the exact time of impact but we can feel the effects by the amount of shortwave radiation." The wave of energy will cause the Earth to partially deflect the communication signals of the GPS system of navigation, and will affect power and communications. Solar flares release huge amounts of energy into space, and sometimes radiation from the flare is directed toward the Earth where it has the potential to disturb radio transmissions, satellite operations, GPS and other electronic systems. This solar storm, a moderate to large flare, is so powerful that it may be the worst yet. The energetic solar flare released on September 9, 2012, was observed by NASA's Solar Dynamics Observatory and the Solar X-Ray Imager instrument on the Solar Terrestrial Relations Observatory, and recorded by many other satellite sensors. The background picture, a dazzling image captured with a coronagraph, showed a huge flare and displays a patch of sunlit areas where it is impossible to see. On the foreground, more of the Sun is covered by the Sun, including the dark areas where the flare has reached it. This was the largest solar flare to be seen from our
